CHAPTER UNDEFINED OF 6

Section 1: Intake Conversion System

NaN%
through guide

In personal injury, intake is everything. A potential client who calls your office is often calling 3-5 firms. The firm that responds fastest, communicates most clearly, and makes the client feel most understood wins the case — regardless of whether it is the best firm. These prompts give you the communication infrastructure to win more intakes consistently.

Case development — from building the damages picture to drafting and negotiating the demand — is where the real work of PI practice happens. These prompts do not replace your legal judgment. They accelerate the mechanical work: organizing facts, drafting narrative, extracting information from records, and structuring arguments. A demand letter that took you 4 hours can take 45 minutes. The quality will be the same or better because you are editing, not writing from scratch.

Section 3: Client Communication System

through guide

Pl clients are anxious, often in pain, often financially stressed, and being handled by an insurance system that is not designed for their benefit. The attorney who communicates proactively, clearly, and compassionately retains clients, gets better cooperation, and generates more referrals. These prompts give you a complete client communication system for every stage of the case.

Insurance adjusters are professional negotiators who handle hundreds of claims a year. Most injured people have never negotiated anything significant. Your job is to neutralize that experience advantage. These prompts give you the communication tools to negotiate confidently and strategically.

Section 6: Settlement and Closing

through guide

Closing a case well is as important as opening it well. A client who receives their settlement feeling informed, respected, and fairly treated refers people. A client who is blindsided by liens, confused by the math, or disappointed by the net amount — even if it was fair — does not refer people. These prompts build an excellent client experience at the finish line.
